THE DIRT: 3 WAYS UNCLEAN OFFICES KILL YOUR BOTTOM LINE

Is your bottom line looking a little spotty? Cleaning and organizing a business space is one of the essential aspects of running a successful business. However, most business owners don't realize its importance until it gets out of control and profits are declining. Yes! There's a connection between a clean office and increased profits.

Instead of letting your office get too dirty, you should professionally clean and maintain it to keep your employees happy, healthy, and productive and make a great first impression on your clients and business partners.

1. Terrible first impression on customers.

A dirty office will turn new customer right back around! A clean, organized, and the well-maintained office is important for promoting a healthy and inviting work environment. If your office is overflowing with bins and has dirty carpets, your customers might be “put off”. This implies that you don't care about the business or the customers.

The outside of your building can also have a negative impression. Keep your signage clean to ensure that customers don't get driven away before reaching your door. Make sure any areas where customers congregate are clean and tidy.

2. Negative impact on work concentration.

Unfocused equals unproductive! It is crucial that your office is tidy to ensure that you and your employees can focus on work. Tidying up your office is essential for helping your brain to concentrate. Employees cannot professionally clean an office and work effectively.

3. Sickness in you or your employees.

If you're sick, you can't make money...period! Many companies suffer from “sick building syndrome”. Employees can become ill more often if a building's dust is too high or has too many bacteria and viruses. More employees taking time off sick means less productivity.

The areas your employees use are as important as the areas your customers see, which is why you should also ensure that you clean them. You can prevent employees from getting sick in your office by improving ventilation and keeping equipment clean.

Bottom line?

In addition to showing potential customers that you care about your brand and your employees, a clean and sanitized workspace indicates professionalism and demonstrates your concern for your employees. Happy employees are more productive, leaving a far better impression than those dealing with a cluttered workspace or an unhealthy working environment.
